People think that because I'm bigger, I don't work; but I'm pretty strong. I am very proud of it, Tabria wrote in an essay for the newspaper. Nude shoot: Tabria Majors, 29, bared everything for an amazing spread featured in Women's Health Perception: In an essay she wrote for the magazine, the model said people on set often assume she doesn't work or eat unhealthy food because she weighs 230lbsShe explained that people often assume she lives a quiet lifestyle or doesn't eat a healthy diet because of her size. When she's on set, she's often told she's happy she doesn't have to work out, and some even go so far as to say they wish they could eat junk food all the time like she does, which is far from the truth. My body is powerful, and I want to maintain this muscle. It takes a lot of calculated diet and specific workouts, she says. To keep fit, Tabria likes to do high intensity interval training and weight training, but she said she rarely gets to show off her strength as a plus-size model. On activewear shots, straight size models will be in speed training and kickboxing shots. In the meantime, I'm told to leave. Or make some outcomes, she explained. But why? Although she does high intensity interval training and lifts weights, Tabria said she's usually told to go on activewear shots instead of working up a sweat showing off her strength: Tabria said she wants to see plus-size models sweat and do real workouts on setChampion: Tabria explained that her approach to body positivity doesn't mean she'll never lose weight , but that means she will love herself no matter what size she isTabria said she wants to see plus-size models sweat and do real workouts on set. Above all, she wants plus-size models to have the same opportunities as models in straight sizes, regardless of arena. She argued that there won't be more progress in body positivity movement if brands don't start taking it seriously and making changes. Brands will use a size 12 model and call it inclusive. But when you're not making any sizes larger than a size 14, is it really? Tabria noted that her attitude to body positivity doesn't mean she'll never lose weight, but it does mean she'll love herself no matter what size she is. She recalled making the choice to accept herself rather than wallow in self-loathing or try to lose weight after her friends embarrassed her for putting on 15lbs in college. Role model: Tabria has made a name for herself as a rising model as well as an advocate for body positivity and inclusivity Making her case: 2017 recreated Victoria's Secret ads to show that curvy girls can rock (and sell) lingerie as well as straight-size modelsAs a plus-size plus-size it's important for me to send myself this size to show other women that it's okay to embrace who you are of any size, she explained. Tabria has made a name for herself as a rising model as well as an advocate for body positivity and inclusivity. She graced the pages of the Sports Illustrated Swimsuit issue last year as a model search finalist, and in 2017 she recreated Victoria's Secret ads to show that curvy girls can rock (and sell) lingerie as well as straight-sized models. Tabria told HuffPost Canada that she wanted to open up the discussion about inclusivity in the mainstream media.I just want to know why they, and so many other companies, didn't cater to the average size woman', she said of the lingerie brand.
