Policy that China endorses capital punishment because justifying it is no physical violence involved with criminals. It is difficult to impose a complete ban on it. However, China has drastically changed its legal system, including the death penalty, over the years. The Chinese government is still executing criminals guilty of serious crimes. The Chinese courts have made many efforts to ensure fairness, but the evidence suggests that the system remains flawed.

Serious crimes only lead to the death penalty in China. The court set an elaborate secrecy system, which has been laid down in the criminal law. The veil on the court has also made it difficult to hold the Chinese justice system accountable. The Chinese government has traditionally been reluctant to disclose the number of executions. The statistics are not justifiable, and the number of executions is likely to be much higher than officially reported.

Despite the abolitionist ideal, China continues to use the death penalty. The Commonwealth is one of the countries that have expressed concerns about capital punishment in China. China has never disclosed any time as an aim to reduce the number of executions. There have been reports of extrajudicial killings in China, and the government has been accused of using the death penalty as a political tool to maintain control.
