Carrying a pointy stick into a makeshift spear, Jack leads a pig through the thick jungle, but he avoids it. Nervous, he returns to the beach, where he finds Ralph and Simon in huts to build work for the younger children to live in. Ralph is nervous because the cabins keep falling before they're complete, and because even though the cabins are essential to the boys' ability to live on the island, none of the boys but Simon will help him. While Ralph and Simon work, most of the other boys splash around playing in the lagoon. Ralph complains that some of the boys are doing some kind of work. He says all the boys are acting excited and excited about the shows they do in meetings, but none of them are willing to work to make the plans successful. Ralph points out that Jack's hunters couldn't catch a single pig. Jack claims that even though they haven't managed to bring down a pig so far, they'll soon have more success. Ralph also cares about the smaller children, many of whom have nightmares and are unable to sleep. He tells Jack about his concerns, but Jack, who's still trying to figure out ways to kill a pig, isn't interested in Ralph's problems. Ralph, angry that Jack, like all other boys, won't work on the cabins, suggests that Jack and the hunters are using their hunting duties as an excuse to avoid the real job. Jack responds to Ralph's complaints by responding that the boys want meat. Jack and Ralph continue to fight and become increasingly hostile towards each other. Hoping to regain their sense of friendship, they go swimming together in the lagoon, but their feelings of mutual distaste remain and are milked. Meanwhile, Simon wanders the jungle alone. He helps some of the younger boys – whom the older children began calling little ones – get to fruit hanging from a tall branch. He goes deeper into the forest and eventually finds a thick clearing in the jungle, a peaceful and beautiful open space full of flowers, birds and butterflies. Simon looks around to make sure he's alone, then sits down to take in the scene, admiring the abundance and beauty of life surrounding him. The analysis of the personal conflict between Ralph and Jack reflects the novel's ongoing thematic conflict. The feud between the two boys is already brewing in the Chapter 1 election, but remains hidden beneath the surface, masked by the friendship the boys feel as they work together to build a community. However, in this episode, the conflict erupts into a verbal argument for the first time, expressing the divisions that pervert the boys' community and set the stage for further violent developments. As Ralph and Jack argue, every child tries to give voice to their basic perception of human purpose: Ralph Building cabins, while Jack's hunting champions. Ralph, who thinks about the good of the team, sees hunting as a light-minded one. Jack, attracted to hunting passion by his passion for blood and his passion for power, has no interest in building huts and has no concern for what Ralph thinks. But because Ralph and Jack are just kids, they can't say their feelings eloquently. At this point in the novel, the conflict between civilization and wildness is still largely skewed in favor of civilization. Jack, who has no real interest in the welfare of the team, had to justify his desire to hunt instead of building huts on the grounds that it was in the best interests of all boys. In addition, although most boys are more interested in acting than at work, they continue to recreate the basic structures of civilization on the island. They're even starting to develop their own language, calling the young kids Lythlon and twins Sam and Eric Semenri. Simon, meanwhile, seems to exist outside the conflict between Ralph and Jack, between civilisation and savagery. We see Simon's kind and generous nature through his actions in this episode. He helps Ralph build the cabins when the other boys prefer to play, indicating his help, discipline and dedication for the common good. Simon helps Litlon reach a high branch of fruit, indicative of his kindness and sympathy - a sharp contrast to many of the big boys, who would rather torture the litlon than help them. As Simon sits alone in the jungle squirting admiring nature's beauty, we see that he feels a fundamental connection to the natural world. In his dating, Simon seems to have a basic kindness and kindness that comes within him and has tied his bond with nature. It seems that all the other children have inherited their ideas of goodness and morality from the outer forces of civilization, the further away they are from human society, the more their moral sense is eroded. In this context, Simon emerges as an important figure against Ralph and Jack. When Ralph represents the dissident forces of civilization and Jack the primal and instinctive impulses that react against such an order, Simon represents a third trait - a kind of natural or innate goodness and not taught by human society. In this way, Simon, who cannot be categorized with the other boys, complicates the symbolic structure of the fly owner. More Research Chapter 3 Quiz Quiz
