This is in contrast to other legal systems, such as common law countries, where minority shareholders are afforded a greater voice. In statutory voting, each shareholder is entitled to one vote per share, regardless of the number of shares owned. In contrast, in cumulative voting, shareholders are entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of shares they own. This allows larger shareholders to have a greater influence over the company's direction. In the cumulative voting system, a shareholder can allocate their votes to any number of candidates. The candidate with the most votes wins. This system is used in some states in the United States where corporate law allows it. The choice of voting system can significantly impact the outcome of a company's elections. Additionally, the voting system can influence the relationship between shareholders and management. Therefore, it is important for companies to carefully consider the voting system that they choose.
