Rest in mourning is a constant and deep stream of conscious thoughts and emotions. Documenting unhealthy relationships and why the heart falls into the hands of those deemed unworthy. It is formatted in an increasingly common style of writing very short poems or simple phrases, rather than more, a few verses of poetry that most people are used to. It is a particularly complex style to write well, since this type of poetry can come across as disjointed or petty easier than more poems. However, when it's done well, it can be surprisingly powerful While this hasn't captivated me the way algedonic did, I still have a pretty positive experience with staying at Mourning. I spoke in my other review about r.h. Sin's talent for writing and what shines through once again in this collection. Its focus is on the power of women, but it still makes for universally relatable reading because of its beautiful writing and depiction of shared highs and minimums of life. Sin knows how to simplify what can be very complex emotions, and the message he conveys is a message of affirmation and strength. Just like the first experience I had with his work, I felt that he had done a good job focusing on the power of each person to heal himself in the midst of or after difficulties. However, this collection, compared to its last, was not very unique. Each poem focuses either on women or, less often, on itself - on finding their true value and removing from toxic relationships. There is nothing inherently wrong with this theme, but I feel that there must be some change, no matter how small. You can still plug your themes together in some way to give the collection a whole one theme, but I haven't found any of this here. So while the way he formulated things were beautiful, overall, each poem felt a little repetitive. I'm still interested in reading more of his work, so I'll certainly continue to do so. ...
