Breville Two Slices Deep Fill Sandwich Toaster Pros: Well-built product, easy cleanCons: On the expensive side for a single purpose machine Score: 4.5/5 Read our full review of the best sandwich toasters and toasted bodies back in the eighties and nineties, the name Breville was synonymous with sandwich toaster. Every family seemed to have one, and every student seemed to get one as leaving the house now when they started university. It's still probably the most famous brand sandwich maker out there today. The machine is slightly confusing to the name as it actually makes two sandwiches at once using four slices of bread. This means that it is ideal for a small family. It's a really solid and substantial sense of toaster, and one that you expect to last a long time. The stainless steel finish looks good too. This comes with very detailed instructions. There are charts showing how to place bread and where to place the filling in a sandwich, and he even recommends the maximum amount of cheese to use (60g if you are interested). The instructions have a recipe section with toast, but other foods using the same plates as cake bites and omelets. Preliminary heating was four minutes. One thing we didn't like was the light that starts with green when you turn on the machine and changes to amber as soon as it is pre-heated to the desired temperature. While it's clear and easy to see, green is usually associated with a go, so it seems counterintuitive to us. On the positive side, there is a high hinge, so you can make a sensible, though not excessive, deep sandwich. Our average supermarket bread fits well into the plates and the chunky handle closed with a satisfying click. We followed the instructions, including butter outside the bread in honor of the fashion time. We gave it the recommended four minutes and the toast was perfect. It even looked mouthwatering after two minutes when we sneaked in a peek. The sandwich was well browned with good print. Cleaning is a doddle as the plates are removable and can be washed by hand or in the dishwasher. Breville has been around for a long time and you get the feeling that they know exactly how to make the perfect toasted sandwich. The machine comes with flyer advertising waffle plates that fit into a sandwich toaster that you can buy with the code for a 10% discount.
