The companion is a person who often spends time with you, is associated with you, or accompanies you when you go places. Communication is like friendship, and a person called a companion is usually their friend or romantic partner. But the word communication specifically implies that a lot of time is spent in each other's company. Teh usually applies to human relationships, but pets can also provide communication. Example: People ridicule older people for using dating sites, but the truth is that many of them are just lonely and looking for companionship. The first recordings of the word communication come from the 1540s. The word companion comes from the late Latin word meaning the one who eats bread with the other, from parts of kom, with and panis, bread. The word company is based on the same roots. The suffix is used in the same way as in words such as friendship and relationships. Communication can come from close friendships or even more intimate relationships, such as siblings or spouses. When you experience communication, it means that you are often in the company of someone to eat together, getting places together, and tending to spend time together. When people describe themselves as looking for companionship on a dating app, this usually means that they are looking for a romantic partner to spend a lot of time with, especially to enjoy the same activity together. Pets often provide companionship that helps people feel less alone. In all cases, communication is about being together. Communication is often used when talking about human relationships, but it can also be applied to communication provided to people by their pets.
